Learning the practical aspects of the writing and communications business is important, but so giving students an outlet to discuss what they are experiencing on campus. "Literary magazines on campuses are important student voices and outlets for students" Kurowski says.

Articles in the Review range from stories about campus life, poetry, and national politics. Magazines have been part of American culture since the 1700s and it's important for students to handle and understand all parts of a publication.

Annual Donor Report

To the York College and York Country Day School Donor Community

Greetings from York! It is a beautiful time of year at York College and York Country Day School. Beautiful in every sense of the word, as each season leaves the campuses looking picturesque. But the beauty goes well beyond the campus scenery. It is on the faces of our students, who are walking to class, grabbing coffee to keep them going, chatting with professors in Johnson, or poring over a book or a laptop in the library. Simple, everyday moments on any campus. And yet, it is moments that are all part of the deep and profound transformation happening to our students. It's a beautiful time of year indeed.

In this report, you will find example after example of how your philanthropy is making that transformation possible every day. There are numbers in this report, of course. And numbers are important to be sure—the number of donors supporting our mission, the number of dollars raised, the number of students enrolled. We are delighted with all of those numbers. But what's equally if not more important in these pages are the stories. The stories of how donors are engaged with us in changing students' lives—donors of time through mentorships and engagement; donors of dollars, large and small, who support existing programs and help to create new opportunities.

We hope that in these pages you truly see your story and that you know how deeply grateful we are for your generosity, partnership, and continued commitment to our mission for over 237 years.

With gratitude to you all,
